PLEA FOR RICHMOND.

WHY THE SOUTH'S GREAT MUSEUM SHOULD BE THERE.

The Foundation Well Laid-Fourteen States Interested in Filling White House of Confederacy With Valuable Mementoes of a Cause That is

The following statement fully explains itself, and will be read with interest by all the people of the entire South, to whom it is addressed by the ladies who have converted the White House of the Confederacy into a museum, which they hope to eventually develop into a great Southern Battle Abbey.

The Confederate Museum in the Jefferson Davis mansion in Richmond, Va., has been formally opened for visitors, and although still incomplete as to its final arrangements and full collection, it is fast assuming proportions which will call for "more room." Judging from its success so far, the door fees and sales of "souvenirs" will meet the current expenses. Visitors from California and expenses. Visitors from California and Minnesota, on the West and North, and all the way down from the East to the South are already registered.

Fourteen States are represented in these rooms, with vice-regents and regents in each State, who are caraestly, but quietly at work. In fact, this work, which is now so far advanced, has been done so quietly that only those who have been laboring, realize that this museum is more than a local institution. The society was started in February, 1890, with exactly the design and scope of what has later become so well-known as the "Battle Abbey of the South," pushed so cargerly by the soldier patriot. Charles B. Rouss. Woman-like, indefatigable zeal and labor has been quietly given, without advertising, and but little publication, and unwoman-like, with not much talk. Every hard carned dollar has been expended onlywhere it seemed to bring substantial returns, until now the mansion and grounds donated by the city), repairs, fire proofing, restoring the building to its original appearance, etc., paid for by funds raised by the society represent not less than $60,000 to $65,000. It has probably been a mistake that the society has not made known more extensively its alm and its success. There has been during these years, a steady collection of relies and there is in actual possession not only relies, but documents and manuscripts of untold value. The Southern Historical Society, in which can be found the most valuable and reliable records and data for the lover of truth and the future historian) except in the War Records' office, in Washington, D. C.), may be designated as a part of this society, having become permanently established in this munsion. In the Georgia room will be found the Mary de Renne collection, one of the most valuable and extensive collections of Southern, together with other papers and relies in existence. This lady began her work early in the war in behalf of an historical society, sparing no trouble or expense, and sing all her personal influence and personalized by Mr. Rouss and the veterans? Cannot this sixty-odd thousand dollars, already raised and wisely expe sacred associations in the hearts of sol-diers from every State, who fought in desperate combat at the gates of this citadel; and the undying love and sorrow of women in every State, whose loved ones ly-ing sleeping in Hollywood and Oakwood —those men whose lives were given willing sacrifice at these gates.

the women of Richmond that this en deavor to establish a Battle Abbey in Richmond would be carrying out the wish of every veteran of their beloved cause; and it was undertaken in the becanse; and it was undertaken in the ne-lief that every one of them would sus-tain this effort to their fullest ability. Should these veterans decide that some other spot can better represent the Con-federacy, there will be no word of com-plaint. As it was through the will of the Southern people that Richmond plaint. As it was through the will of the Southern people that Richmond should be their representative in the past, she gladly accepted the trust; and, as she stood at the front, amid the shock of battle, while her fields were bathed in blood, so, again, if this honor and crown be placed upon another's brow, she will stand will stand-
